There are but few uses to which whale oil has been applied, in which it has not to greater or less extent been supplanted by petroleum in some form, and while the export of whale oils has for the past ten years been steadily diminishing, that of coal oils, owing to their cheapness, has increased in greater ratio. For the year 1870 the value of coal oils exported amounted to $31,911,215 as shown by Custom House tables, exceeding the total gold coin and bullion net export by nearly seven and a half millions, and the export of pork, lard, hams and bacon by eleven millions. On the list for 1870, the petroleum export stood third in value, being exceeded only in cotton and breadstuffs. The extraordinary dimensions assumed by the traffic in petroleum has led some economists to predict that it would, at an early day, so far supplant the whale oils in the markets as to HAS DONE MORE BUSINESS during other evidence in the case: The defendant, in fastest trips on record between Australia and bring about an abandonment of the whale-fishers. But there are certain departments of tr and industry in which coal oils cannot be applied to the same purposes as the fish oils are, and without which they must cease. It is obvious, therefore, that the fisheries will continue to afford a large field for profitable enterprise, though it may be doubtful whether they offer such inducements as will cause the places of the one seventh of the entire fleet, destroyed by the late calamity, to be filled with other vessels. There is every reason to believe that the remaining 216 whaling vessels owned in the United States, will find most profit-
